Narration 6

With his thoughts still spinning to the dance, Jude let out a mighty cry … "STOP!" As his voice echoed round the mountain, he looked up to see the figure of the mysterious lady vanish into a white swirl. Just as she had disappeared, so the mist slowly melted into thin air.

Jude was alone.

Now it was clear, he could make out two paths. As he stood wondering which one to take, he felt an icy chill surround him. He realised now that, like an unmistakeable sign, this signalled the presence of the lady in white. Within seconds the sky was full of pure white driving snow. Yet this was not like any snowfall he could ever remember. It was a blizzard of such strength that it was like a solid wall of white.

He drew his coat tightly around him and looked for the paths. This time there was no choice. Only one way lay ahead of him. The other path had been blocked by snow. He was left with no alternative but to go up the mountain path. To stray from it in these conditions would have been fatal. As he battled against the blizzard, he could not help but think, had she, the lady in white, made the decision for him. Snow-blind, Jude made his way carefully along the track. He struggled and scrambled towards the top of the mountain.
